. For rear leaf spring setups, these items help correct your rear end to driveshaft angle and eliminate vibration during operation at all speeds. Misalignment is common on lowered and lifted vehicles. Our axle shims are also an important item when you have added power steering to your vintage straight axle front end. Original straight axle front ends came with minimal caster angle to make steering easier on the driver. When power steering is added, the caster angle must be increased or "road wander" becomes prevalent.

Dana-Spicer 45

GMC trucks used Dana rears for many of the same applications where Chevy had Eaton. AFAIK, those Danas are a direct swap into Chevy trucks- the Dana has more highway-friendlier gearing.

Apart from the expected parts differences, the Dana also uses different brake drums.

Spicer/Dana 44 rear axles are identified by a casting number stamped into the webbing on the front of the differential case to the driver's side of the driveshaft. Front axles have a model number cast just below where the right-side axle tube connects to the differential. On this same axle tube, you will find a build date and a bill of materials number stamped into the body of the tube. This bill of materials number is important for ordering replacement parts and identifying what the differential originally came out of. The number will be six digits long with a seventh number after a dash. The last digit identifies the ring and pinion ratio at the time of production. A complete list of the bill of materials numbers for both Dana 44s and Dana 60s is available on the parts locator

Chevys had the 3.90 rear gears; GMCs had the 3.91 (or 3.92?) gears.

First figure out what rear end you have. Chevy rear end is the HO33 it has a round, removable rear cover, AND a drop out center section.

The GMC should have a Spicer/Dana 45 which has a removable rear cover, and you can't take the pumpkin out. The cover is shaped kind of like a stop sign.

TRANSMISSION

41-0SM420-TS SM420 4 speed trans

41-03305

The SM-420 4-speed transmission was produced by General Motors between the years of 1947 & 1967. Starting in 1966 General Motors offered the NP-435GA for its light truck applications as an option. The NP-435-GA became the standard 4-speed sometime in the late 1960s. The cast iron case with large bulge on the passenger side makes the SM-420 easy to identify. Ribbing was added to the bulge on later cases. The ribbed SM-420 case should not be confused with the later SM-465 transmission. How can you tell which 4-speed your 1966 has, if reverse is to the driver & down, it's the SM-420, if to the passenger & down

Chevrolet Engine Identification

When you build a chassis and position the driveline components, you need to orient them so that the angle of a line drawn through the center of the transmission exiting through the output shaft (A) and a line drawn through the center of the driveshaft (B) is equal to but opposite the angle of a line drawn through the pinion shaft in the rear differential (C) and the line drawn through the center of the driveshaft (B). The accompanying drawing illustrates how the lines drawn through the transmission and pinion shafts (A&C) are parallel to each other, though not in the same plane.

Next step is to measure the rear end pinion shaft angle. It should be pointing upward towards the front with the vehicle sitting at ride height on a level surface. At least 1-degree and ideally not more than 3-degrees up. You can alter the rear end pinion shaft angle by inserting or removing wedge shaped shims under the rear spring mounts or by adjusting the length of the control arms positioning the rear end.
